80 Analysis of the United States' New Central Asia Strategy Zeng Xianghong

The United States' new Central Asia strategy, issued in the context of increased efforts by the US government to contain Russia and China with both elements of continuity and changes, will inevitably have an impact on the development of the Central Asian countries and major-power relations in the region. However, constrained by various factors, the new strategy will hardly yield the expected goals.

109 America's Return to Central and Eastern Europe and its Implications

He Zhigao

The Trump administration sees Central and Eastern Europe as a new regional strategic foothold in great-power competition and an extension of US grand strategic adjustment. With complex strategic considerations, the US return to the region will weaken the EU's strategic autonomy and undermine the transatlantic ties, and also add uncertainty to China-CEEC cooperation.

123 A New Competitive Situation in the Digital Economy and China's Actions

Pan Xiaoming

The digital economy and the subsequent changes in the international division of labor are reshaping the original global value chains and redefining the competitive advantages of countries. While strengthening its own digital technology research as well as digital economy construction, China should properly handle differences and competition with Western countries to facilitate sound development of the international digital economy.

141 China and Central Asian Countries Jointly Building the Digital Silk Road: Foundations, Challenges and Paths

Wang Haiyan
