Economic Growth and the Goal of Overall Well-off Society to the Epidemic

Liu Wei

Under the severe impact of the epidemic, China's economic growth in 2020 is facing unprecedented difficulties. How fast can China's economic growth reach in 2020? Can this speed support the goal of economic and social development and the requirement of stable economic operation? The 2020 government work report does not set an economic growth rate target. Can we say that we don't need to guarantee a certain economic growth? Can China's economy bear the impact of the epidemic, and then achieve the goal of an overall well-off society in 2020, and win the battle of poverty alleviation? These problems are discussed in this paper.

Thus, this paper aims to review the management activities implemented in China against the epidemic based on the data collected from text and crawler analysis, as well as from interviews. The key findings of this paper are threefold. First, it is found that the key activities implemented in China against the epidemic can be classified into basic and support activities. Second, a framework for epidemic management is proposed, which consists of different key elements of basic and support activities. Third, the national system of China under the concept of "life is much more important", the strong organizational mobilization capabilities of Chinese governments, and the digital platforms are recognized as three indispensable conditions for China to control the epidemic successfully. These findings not only lay a solid theoretical foundation for the in-depth study of large-scale public health emergency from the micro dynamic perspective, but also facilitate the reconstruction of the global governance system for public
