The Information Content of Alternative Data: Evidence from E-commerce Sales

Liao Li, Cui Xiangbo and Sun Qiong

Using online sales data of listed companies in the consumer sector, we investigate whether consumers' online consumption activities can convey value—related information to the financial market. Our results show that online sales data contains information related to the company's fundamentals, which can predict the company's standardized unexpected revenue, standardized unexpected earnings and the announcement return. We also find that for companies with low investor attention, fast growth rate and high transparency of accounting information, alternative data has better predictability. Based on these heterogeneity tests, this paper also analyzes in details the reason why e-commerce sales data has predictive effect. E-commerce sales data is directly related to the consumer behavior and the sales activities of the listed companies, hence is a representative kind of alternative data. The study of the information content and investment value of e-commerce sales data contributes to the growing literature on big data and provides empirical evidence on the role of alternative data in emerging capital markets.

Life Expectancy, Pension Contribution Rate Reduction and Elderly Labor Supply with a Discussion on Chinese Retirement Policy Reform

Wang Wei and Wang Wenpeng

By constructing an overlapping generation model including institutional structure and heterogeneity of workers' retirement decision-making, this paper examines the impact of life expectancy and pension insurance fee reduction on the supply of the elderly labors. Results show that due to the flexibility of the elderly labor supply outside the system, reducing the pension insurance rate can promote the elderly to delay their retirement, which is conducive to improving the social elderly labor supply. If workers in the system can also choose the working hours flexibly when they are old or the legal retirement age is extended, reducing the pension insurance rate can increase the social labor supply of the elderly. The impact of the extension of life expectancy on the social labor supply of the elderly is uncertain, which depends on the reduction of the payment rate. If the contribution rate falls to range of (12%, 20%), the extension of life expectancy will lead to the increase of social labor supply for the elderly. However, if the contribution rate drops to 12% and below, there is an inverted U-shaped relationship between life expectancy and social labor supply for the elderly. At present, the life expectancy has been on the right side of the inflection point, which means that there is a "lower limit" on the policy goal of reducing pension insurance premiums. Further, this paper confirms that whether the pension insurance fee reduction reform can achieve the dual goals of Pareto improvement of social welfare and effective utilization of elderly labor resources depends not only on the reduction of payment rate,
