- 14 ● The Theory of Functional Currency and the High-quality Development of China's Economy Shi Zhengfu

Since 2012, the focus of China's economy development has shifted from high-speed to high-quality. Correspondingly, most of the Western macroeconomic theories are not applicable to the current reality of China. To create an innovative theoretical guidance, the author proposes a dual-track system in the field of investment combining national strategy and market spontaneous behavior. When the COVID-19 pandemic is triggering a global financial crisis, China must explore the theory of socialist functional currency for the country's long-term development.

- 26 ● Governance in the Era of Dual Social Transformation Jiang Shigong

China is developing into a post-industrial information society while industrialization and modernization are still in process. The COVID-19 crisis has exposed problems of national governance in this transitional stage: industrial-era decision-making mechanism remains in some local governments; "peasant mentality" still exists among some officials and the masses. In such juxtaposition of agricultural, industrial and post-industrial process, it is a challenge to prevent risks hidden in a society where population and information are flowing at a high speed.

- 36 ● Reflection on Industrial Mobilization and Industrial Culture in the Anti-Epidemic "Total War" Yan Peng

Since the outbreak of COVID-19, Chinese government had fully mobilized all sectors to launch a "Total War" against the epidemic. The industrial sector played a significant role in the material supply and the infrastructure construction of emergency hospitals. As a "world factory", China has a huge and comprehensive ecosystem of industries, which has become a major advantage of industrial mobilization in this war. Meanwhile, the problems exposed in the anti-epidemic battle also remind us to improve our industrial culture with consciousness of crisis prevention.

- To understand the process and socio-historical dynamics of American state-building in the modern era, this article synthesizes the essentials of previous scholarships in relevant fields and proposes a broad conceptual schema that consist of "welfare state", "national security state", "managerial state", and "associational state", which respectively reveal major aspects and idiosyncrasies of the United States. Additionally, it discusses the ways in which the growth of organizational and associational power of the American society was contributing to the state-building project.*

- 104 • State Capitalism in Morocco Zhang Yuyou
- The core foundation of Morocco's development model is the combination of state intervention and capitalist mode of production. After liberalization reforms in the 1980s, with Morocco's state capitalism maturing, the direct product of which was the emergence of a large number of national champions. National champions have played a huge positive role in boosting employment, increasing GDP, contributing tax revenues, and enriching the investment structure. However, social problems such as inequality, poverty, and education are the key factors restricting the effectiveness of the development model.*

- 123 • From "Guo Guo" to "Yi Zu": The Identity Transition of Long Yun and its Enlightenment Zhao Zheng
- Ethnopolitics has become an important issue in the nation-building process since the impact of nationalism in Modern China. Yet it is easy to overlook the dynamics and complexity of identity construction by overemphasizing ethnic differences inside China. The identity change of Long Yun, who belongs to the Yi group and ruled Yunnan province for 18 years, reveals the conflicts between frontier governance and modern ethnopolitics. His reflection on the national identification project remains significant today.*
