严重的不仅是病毒，而是病毒的时刻——全球化的流通能量超过了每个地方承受风险能力的当代时刻。

32 病毒的全球时刻

新冠疫情加速了 2008 年金融危机以来的全球经济衰退，很可能会重构世界的政治经济秩序，甚至会撼动人类文明的一些底层理念。

32	● Why is Globalization Irreversible	Zhu Yunhan
34	As COVID-19 strikes the current neoliberal global system, some predict that the post-pandemic world may witness a complete reversal of globalization. However, most of such pessimistic expectations assume that the United States' leadership is an irreplaceable key to the global multilateral system, which may not be true, as China, Europe and many emerging economies are willing and able to take over the next wave of globalization. The neoliberalism-led globalization may have come to an end, but new model of globalization is already in the making.

45	● The Epidemic is Accelerating the Fourth Wave of Globalization	Zhang Yunling
	Since the 2008 financial crisis, the once-cheered neoliberal globalization has been more and more called into question and losing its support in government policies, public opinion and the credit market. In the recent COVID-19 pandemic, globalization is once again blamed for its fragility and insecurity, which gives rise to a new wave of anti-globalization. However, this is not likely to be the end of globalization, but rather the beginning of a restructuring phase that leads to an era of post-liberal globalization.

64	● Globalization's Iterative Evolution: Towards a Diversified World	Wang Xiangsui
	After WWII, the United States has built a global system in which itself plays a leading role. This system has been fraught with problems since the 2008 financial crisis, and the recent COVID-19 pandemic has catalyzed its collapse. The post-pandemic world will iterate into a diversified world with several regional power centers, each with its own balanced economic structure, independent monetary system, complete industrial chain, self-sufficient market and sustainable resource. The China-led pan-Asian community will become one of the hubs of the new global system.

Development is the fundamental and initial aspiration of the Communist Party of China. Yet, the distribution of profit in the process of development has also been a global conundrum. For decades, China has been addressing this problem through a huge project of poverty alleviation. As the redistribution of benefit requires certain radical measures that go beyond the boundaries of existing bureaucratic system, the project has been carried out through a revolutionary mass mobilization mechanism. The poverty alleviation project embodies the consensus of society, and shows that the CPC has remained committed to its initial goal of development.

98 ● How Targeted Poverty Alleviation Changes Rural Governance Structure

Wang Xiaoyi

The "targeted poverty alleviation" presented by President Xi requires a fundamental transformation of China's rural governance, which includes a new system of information collection and analysis, administrative cadres' pervasive interference of in daily governance, and rural residents' more institutionalized participation in rural public affairs. It is also a campaign-style governance that requires local governments to mobilize human and material resources with high intensity and adopt extraordinary measures, which could bring a long-term impact on rural governance.

China's success in high-speed rail innovation proves the effectiveness of the cooperation-competition model and the institutional advantages of China's concentrated system. This model of competition and cooperation is not the product of market mechanism, but the result of social construction. There are three stages of social construction in high-speed rail innovation: coercive isomorphism at the initial stage of innovation, imitative isomorphism at the stage of technology introduction, and normative isomorphism at the stage of independent innovation and technology export.
