30	“Creative Destruction” “Springboard Trap” and the Nature of China-U.S. Relations This article argues that the U.S. has unique geopolitical advantages, a military force second to none, and a social environment highly conducive to creativity, yet it has also a very low capacity to launch effective reforms in dealing with domestic social problems. This combination of strengths and weaknesses creates a spillover effect internationally, and can sometimes bring great destruction to other countries. I call this US inclination “the springboard trap” and argue that avoiding this trap should be China’s top foreign policy priority.	Zhao Dingxin
43	Total Strategic Competition: New Positioning of U.S.’s Strategy towards China U.S. adjusts its strategy towards China at times, according to its own interests. Facing China’s rise, the U.S. has made strategic changes, from Obama’s “rebalancing” to Trump’s “containment and decoupling”, to today’s “comprehensive strategic competition”. While the competition between two powers is natural, the hostility is likely to bring about serious damages to both and the left part of the world. Wisdom is needed to avoid the confrontation.	Zhang Yunling Sun Zhiqiang
53	When has China-U.S. Relation Undergone a Fundamental Change?—Insights from Quantitative Analysis of Massive Media Data This article defines the qualitative change in the China-U.S. relations as U.S. actively engaging in forming multiple, even global forces to contain China’s rise. By using the GDELT to construct a Bilateral Relations Index (BLR) to characterize the China-U.S. relation , this article shows that 2010 was the year of the fundamental change, in which U.S. mobilized a global force to contain China.	Gao Jianbo Hu Qiyue Liu Bin Zhong Feiteng Chen Dingding

	This article takes contemporary fandom, a large collection of active communities on China’s Internet, as a model for exploring the virtual community of contemporary Chinese youth. Taking the Internet social platform as the basic field of community activities, and based on the principles of communication in the new media era, the fandom has successfully invaded the public sphere and become an active participant in cyberspace. Deviating from their initial interest, the online fandom groups should be understood as an extraordinary online social form which hovers between the capital platform and the field of public opinion, so to maximize the interests of the group in cyberspace.

128	Imperial Science and Imperial Domination	Chen Xuefei
	From vehicles of civilizational mission to instruments of domination and cultural hegemony, science and the expansion of empire are inseparable. For developing countries wishing to launch a decolonization agenda and pursue their own development paths, it is necessary to reconceptualize the history of the relationship between science and empire, to reflect deeply on the globalization of the North Atlantic standard, and to clarify the extent to which it is possible to distinguish modernization from Westernization and find a development path truly in line with their own traditions, cultures, and people’s needs.

138	70 Years since Founding: A Historical Observation of China’s Revival	Hu Chuansheng
	Since 200 BC, among 2000 years, Chinese culture has experienced six revivals. The peaceful daily order, the substantial increase in goods and services available to ordinary people, and return to the center of international relations constitute the basic contents of all previous rejuvenation. The Chinese classics, the continuity of cultural ideals and lifestyles, as well as the refined civil service system based on the imperial examination reflect the accumulation of this culture. Based on contemporary technologies, in the context of globalization, and reflecting the identity of Chinese culture, the revival of contemporary China is a great phenomenon with global historical significance.
