Research Reports

- The Pacific Ocean Is Wide Enough For All Research Group, CICIR 1
- The Pacific Region seems to be deteriorating into a high-risk area. Building an overarching Trans-Pacific Security Cooperation Architecture is the call of the hour. The aim is to fill the vacuum of a region-wide all-embracing arrangement to compensate for the deficiencies of existing multi-lateral mechanisms. Fortunately, the Pacific Ocean offers ample space to accommodate all players in their pursuit of shared peace and common development.
- The Changing Asia-Pacific Strategic Picture Qi Dapeng & Zhang Chi 20
- The Asia-Pacific region has evolved into a main battlefield of international strategic rivalry. Tensions are escalating in China's surrounding areas. China should strike a dynamic balance between defending its legitimate rights and ensuring regional stability by seizing the strategic initiative in managing crises and conflicts on the basis of stabilizing foreign relations and pressing on with international cooperation.

China and the World

- The Rise of Middle Power and China's New Focus in Diplomacy Jin Canrong, Dai Weilai & Jin Junda 34
- The role of middle power is far-reaching, having evolved as a leading force in international relations. In confronting the new dynamic China should change its middle power perspective within its foreign strategy. By adjusting its strategic relations with middle powers promptly and making an explicit stance, China can achieve more flexibility, effectiveness and power in diplomacy.
- Sino-Philippine Dispute over the South China Sea and Its Prospects Li Jinming 49
- Recently, the Philippines has taken the case of the Sino-Philippine dispute over the South China Sea to international arbitration, and the U.S. has also made irresponsible comments in order to sign the U.S.-Philippine Enhanced Defense Cooperation Agreement. All these are not conducive to a solution in the South China Sea dispute, and will not change the fact of China's sovereignty over the Nansha Islands and their adjacent waters.

International Politics and Security

The U.S. Decline Debate and Its Impact

Xu Bu 72

The on-going debate about whether the U.S. is in decline has been controversial. The estimation of IMF and World Bank that China's economic aggregate will soon overtake the U.S. further alarms Americans. To conclude, whether the U.S. is in decline or not matters not only to itself, but also to the international order and global trend.

Rethinking on China-U.S. Relations

Chu Shulong & Tao Shasha 88

The confrontational attitude of the U.S. on Asian-Pacific security issues should trigger China to develop a new model of major-country relations involving arms preparations for air and sea conflict. China must avoid total confrontation while simultaneously preparing itself against partial confrontations with the U.S.

An Analysis of Japan's 'Active Pacifism'

Wang Shan 100

Japanese Prime Minister Shinzo Abe's policy of 'Active Pacifism' covers Japan's internal affairs, diplomacy and security. Its focus is on amending the pacifist constitution and exercising Japan's right of collective self-defense. Japan wants a military transformation and a bigger voice in settling international disputes. The international community should watch Japan closely under the ever-changing Asia-Pacific security situation.

Future of Germany's Policy of Active Diplomacy

Li Chao 111

When the new German government decided to adjust foreign policy, the intention was to bear more responsibility. However, historical reasons and multiple limitations will make it impossible for a "policy of active diplomacy" to fully unfold soon. Yet the country's status and independence, its relations with other big powers, and its leadership in the EU will strengthen.

Hot Topic Discussion

Why Is the Abe Government so Anxious to Improve Relations with China?

Before the APEC meeting, the Abe government had repeatedly expressed its hopes for diplomatic dialogue with China. The Abe cabinet's shift in attitude towards China has attracted wide international attention. This journal invited some well-known Japan experts to analyze and discuss current sensitive questions.
